

PRIVACY: Copyright Public Records

When you register a claim to copyright with the Copyright Office, you create a public record of your claim. Some information you provide on your copyright claim will be available to the public and will be on the Internet.

Can I see my copyright registration records?

Yes. The Copyright Office is required by law to maintain records of copyright registrations and to make them available for public inspection. Once a registration is completed and a claim has been cataloged, it becomes part of the public record. Individuals have always been able to come to the Copyright Office to inspect its public records. Information in post-1978 registration records is also available on the Copyright Office's website.

Will my registration records help provide contact information for someone interested in using my work?

Yes. Records of copyright registrations and recorded documents having to do with copyright can be used by the public to identify the author(s) and copyright owner(s) of a work. The public record may also provide information about an owner's agent who can be contacted to license the registered work and to grant permission to use it.

Can I remove information that I don't want publicized?

No. When you register a claim to copyright with the Copyright Office, you create a public record of your claim. This record cannot be removed from the public record once it has been entered. Some information you provide on your copyright registration form will be available to the public and will be on the Internet. You may wish to consider whether you want to include on your application a birth date, nickname, alias, or any other optional detail that you consider to be sensitive.

The screenshot shows a Netscape browser window with the address bar displaying "http://www.copyright.gov". The website header includes "THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS" and "Copyright United States Copyright Office". A search bar is present with the text "Search our site". A navigation menu contains links for "About", "News", "Publications", "Forms", "Law", "Licensing", "Registration", and "Search Records". A banner message reads "An important message about mail delivery". The main content area is divided into three columns: "Hot Topics" (listing Fee Changes, Webcasting Rates, Anticircumvention Rulemaking, and 2001 Annual Report), "About Copyright" (listing Copyright Basics, Frequently Asked Questions (FAQ), Current Fees, and Top Searches), and "How to Register a Work" (listing Literary Works, Visual Arts, Performing Arts, Sound Recordings, and Serials/Periodicals).

How can I prevent personal information from being placed on the Copyright Office website?

Certain information that must be provided on the application for registration will become a permanent part of the public record of the Copyright Office, and some elements in the public record will be available online through the Office's website, including the name and address of the copyright claimant. Information provided in the rights and permissions section of the application will also be made available online, but providing rights and permissions information is optional. Applicants who want to include rights and permissions information but do not want to provide personal details can use third-party agents, post office boxes, or designated email accounts. If someone else submits an application on your behalf, it is still your responsibility to ensure that information that you want to keep out of the public record is omitted. In certain cases, it may be permissible to register a claim in a work either anonymously or pseudonymously (under a fictitious name). Other categories of information in copyright applications that may be made available online include the following: type of work, registration number, title of the work, author, authorship, preexisting material, date of creation, and date of publication.

Why is my copyright registration information now appearing on search engines such as Google?

Because your copyright registration is a public record, others can access it and may create alternative means to make the information in it more widely available. The Copyright Office is not responsible for the form or the substance of third-party redistribution of Copyright Office records.
